What do actuaries do?

Actuaries are business professionals who deal with the financial impact of risk and uncertainty. They have a deep understanding of finance and business and model the world around them, evaluating the likely impact of future events.

Their advice is essential to many industries, including banking and investments, insurance, healthcare and pensions, where a single decision can have a major financial impact or affect hundreds of thousands of people. Therefore, the skills of an actuary are highly respected and sought after. The role of an actuary is very diverse and the skills that you will gain from undertaking the qualification can take you anywhere in the world.

The role of an actuary

Their advice is essential to many industries, including banking and investments, insurance, healthcare and pensions, where a single decision can have a major financial impact or affect hundreds of thousands of people. The skills of an actuary are highly respected and sought after, and qualifying is not easy.

The qualifications you'll need

You will need a good grade in A level or Scottish Higher maths, and usually a good degree in a numerate subject such as mathematics, statistics, sciences or economics. You then join an actuarial firm and develop your skills while you qualify by taking our professional exams. This usually takes between three and six years. If you have a degree or full time post-graduate qualification in a numerate subject, you may be exempt from some of our exams.

Life as an actuary

Studying for the professional exams is very demanding, although most employers provide study leave, as well as help with tuition fees. However, it can prove very rewarding as it is a very satisfying and stimulating career. It offers intellectual challenge, an influential role and an excellent salary. It is very diverse and the skills that you will gain from undertaking the qualification can take you anywhere in the world. Actuaries are business professionals who deal with the financial impact of risk and uncertainty. They have a deep understanding of finance and model the world around them, evaluating the likely impact of future events.

How to become an actuary

It makes sense to experience first hand what's involved, by doing a work placement. This also gives you a chance to meet and chat to working actuaries, and will stand you in good stead if you then decide to pursue a career as an actuary.

You can apply for a work placement by sending your CV and a covering letter to a company listed in this booklet, or by completing their own application form.

Your school or university careers service may also have information on work experience vacancies.

You can join the Institute and Faculty of Actuaries (IFoA), the UK professional body by contacting us at:

“Choosing a career as an actuary upon leaving university was an obvious choice for me. I enjoyed studying mathematics at degree level and wanted to join a profession that would challenge me whilst allowing me to use aspects of my degree in my day-to-day work.”

“I’d definitely encourage people to find out more about being an actuary. From what I’ve experienced so far, it can be a very rewarding career. There are also opportunities to work abroad, as the qualification is internationally recognised. I know that the skills I’m learning and the qualification I’m working towards will be valuable and highly regarded in many other fields.”
